

POETRY.

The Warrior Lover.

By THE LEJEFFERSON SUTHERLAND.

I.

Away to the wars, my lover has gone,
Where the bugle's note is heard;
When awakes the hour of the last at dawn,
And the foeman's flag is raised;

His helmet and plume, and badges of gold,
And blade gleam bright in the sun,

As he spurs on his steed, dashing and bold,
Over the field where fame is won.

II.

Amid the wild shout, and din of the fight,
And the booming gun's discharge—

(A tempest of death)—as on thy stand, and bright,

Leads he the brave to the charge;

Though dread be the combat, that wages the foe,

Who for the contest is strong;

Yet, by his arm, which now levels the blow,

Their might is broken as a thong.

III.

Ah! but the thought that my lover may fall,

To sleep with the mangled slain—

Wounded with sabre, or crushed by a ball,

Gives sadness, sorrow and pain;

But, never a weapon can employ,

Shall dip in his life-blood warm;

Nor the dark iron-globe, winged to destroy,

Come near to his gallant form.

IV.

On! let him press where the carnage is rife,

And have's spreading wide;

My spirit with him shall be in the strife,

His breast from peril to guide!

Then, from the conflict he comes back to me,

With love to redeem his vow;

And, of green laurel entwined, shall there be

Glory's gay wreath for his brow.
